Barron Electric Compared to Municipals and Investor-owned Utilities (IOU) in Wisconsin

What sets electric cooperatives apart is that the cooperative business model keeps the focus on the member and the communities they serve. Electric cooperatives serve the rural areas, since the return on investment was not high enough to attract the investor-owned utilities (IOUs). When utilities started serving the more densely populated areas, rural citizens formed a cooperative to supply their electric needs.

Barron Electric's staff and board of directors work on behalf of our members to keep rates affordable. Since Barron Electric Cooperative only serves the rural areas, the cooperative serves 5 members per mile of line, compared with 47 customers per mile by Wisconsin municipals and 35 customers by Wisconsin IOUs.

Barron Electric's facilities charge includes all fixed expenses such as Right-of-Way maintenance, metering, equipment, accounting, and taxes. As shown in the graph, municipals and IOUs collect a smaller facility charge, but receive more revenue.

Electric cooperatives are leading the way in developing new, cleaner coal plants along with alternatives to fossil fuels, which can also be more expensive.
